PREFACE

The present work is intended primarily as a tool for the learning of Norwegian by American students. For advanced students it will serve also as an introduction to a scientific description of the Norwegian language. These purposes have dictated the inclusion of some novel features suggested by the editor's experience as an American teacher of Norwegian. (a) It is the first dictionary in any language to include both forms of Norwegian, Bokmål (Riksmål, Dano-Norwegian) and Nynorsk (Landsmål, New Norwegian) in one alphabet, and the first Norwegian-English dictionary to include Nynorsk.<sup>1</sup> (b) It is the first Norwegian-English dictionary to give the pronunciation of the Norwegian words. (c) It is the first such dictionary to label areas of usage and to include quotations from Norwegian authors. Some useful features that are not as common in bilingual dictionaries as they might be are the inclusion of common abbreviations, of important place and proper names, and of cultural features. The grammatical information is fuller than in any previous work of its kind. Norwegian-English dictionaries prepared in Norway are oriented towards the Norwegian learner of English and are, therefore, very sparing in their information on Norwegian. It is hoped that the present dictionary will serve as a desk handbook for anyone interested in reading modern Norwegian, and in learning to use it in speaking and writing.

The orientation to American users will be apparent in the English glosses, which are in American English instead of the British English that has characterized most previous Norwegian-English dictionaries. However, the emphasis has been on a standard English such as is used by the best American writers and speakers, with slang specifically labeled as (pop.). Norwegians learning English are likely to find American English increasingly useful to them. More English synonyms have been included than strictly necessary, and they have been organized in such a way that the user should be able to decide which English word to use in a given context. The Norwegian user will also find that the information given on his native language is more copious than in any one-volume dictionary available to him in Norway. Here he will find all the spellings of any word that have been in use since 1917, within the limits of space available, for both languages and the manifold varieties of each down through the Textbook Norm of 1959.

The idea of preparing such a dictionary was first suggested to the Editor by his friend and then colleague, the late Dr. Sverre Kjeldstadli. The Editor had already been concerned over many years with the problems of teaching and analyzing Norwegian. His textbooks (Beginning Norwegian 1937, Reading Norwegian 1939, and Spoken Norwegian 1944, revised edition 1964) could do no more than start the learner on his path. Beyond this the learner was on his own, with the dictionary as his only crutch. The dictionaries were either out-dated, inaccurate, or limited in their vocabulary selection. The students' need could be met for a time by the preparation of a number of page-by-page glossaries to current Norwegian books. But the only long-term solution was a dictionary which would be comprehensive enough to meet the students' need. The Editor had at his disposal a large body of materials in the form of more than two million vocabulary slips collected in the 1930's from the writings of certain classic Norwegian authors (published in part in 1942 as Norwegian Word Studies, 2 volumes). But he hesitated to undertake a dictionary until he could envisage a possibility of financing the project. In 1958 the National Defense Education Act began to make funds available for the preparation of materials in "neglected languages," a category for which Norwegian qualified. An application for funds was honored by the Office of Education in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in Washington, D.C., resulting in a contract between that office and the University of Wisconsin. It was estimated that the basic work should be completed in two and a half years, which proved to be feasible. Space was provided at the University of Wisconsin from June 1961 to June 1964, with most of the work being done between September 1961 and September 1963. During the latter period the Editor worked full time on the dictionary (except for teaching one class), directing and coordinating the efforts of a staff which averaged five full-time workers.

The Editor hereby expresses his gratitude to the Office of Education and the director of its Language Section, A. Bruce Gaarder, for their readiness to support this project. Above all he is grateful to Mr. James E. Alatis, Specialist for Research, and Mrs. Julia A. Petrov, Research Assistant, in the Bureau of Educational Assistance Programs, who were his immediate contacts and constant counselors. He is deeply grateful to the University of Wisconsin Graduate School and its Dean, John E. Willard, who provided funds for one Project Associate and two Project Assistants throughout the duration of the project; to The University of Wisconsin College of Letters of Science and its Dean, Mark H. Ingraham, who, with the assistance of the Trustees of the William F. Vilas Trust Estate, made it possible for the Editor to be freed from teaching for this project; to the University of Wisconsin Press and its director, Thompson Webb, Jr., who accepted the dictionary for publication and provided numerous services in the form of advice and editing; to Universitetsforlaget i Oslo (the University of Oslo Press) and its director, Tønnes Andenæs, who accepted the dictionary for publication in Norway and helped to get it printed in the best possible form; and to the director and staff of the Center for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences, Stanford, California, where the writing was completed.

The Editor is particularly grateful to the members of his staff, whose names are listed above (p. 7), for their willingness to take time to assist in the planning and preparation of a book which in many ways has consumed time without yielding adequate returns in the form of personal satisfactions. Their work as "harmless drudges" (in Samuel Johnson's phrase) has at least made possible the reduction of drudgery for those who will have occasion to use the book. Mrs. Lully Lund merits special mention for her faithful proofreading of the entire book. Many thanks are due to the Editor's Norwegian colleagues in the Department of Scandinavian Studies at the University of Wisconsin, Professors Harald S. Næss and H. P. Krosby, who patiently answered his many questions on Norwegian usage; likewise to Alf Hellevik and Professor Alf Sommerfelt, of the University of Oslo, both of whom read and criticized an early version of the Introduction. Tape recordings of pronunciation were made by Ann Mari Næss, H. P. Krosby, Ragnhild Grev-stad, Anne Margrete Manner, Dr. Samuel Abrahamsen, Prof. Alf Sommerfelt, and Aimée Sommerfelt. Thanks go to these and to many others who will have to remain unnamed.

Special thanks go to William T. Evjue, editor of Madison's Capital Times, who made a donation of $1,000 in memory of his Norwegian-born parents, Nils and Martha Evjue, to aid in defraying the costs of publication.

Finally, he wishes to single out for mention his wife, Eva Lund Haugen, whose share in the dictionary extends far beyond the work she did as a part-time member of the staff.

INTRODUCTION

1 Instructions to the User

The reader is advised to study this section carefully so that he may derive maximum benefit from the use of the Dictionary. Each dictionary entry contains some or all of the following items of information, which are briefly explained below. More detailed treatment is given to some of them in the rest of the Introduction.

- 1.1 The Main Entry
- 1.2 Language Membership
- 1.3 Pronunciation
- 1.4 Grammar
- 1.5 Cross References
- 1.6 Secondary Entries
- 1.7 Usage Labels
- 1.8 English Glosses
- 1.9 Supplementary Notes
- 1.10 Idiomatic Phrases
- 1.11 Literary Illustrations

1.1 THE MAIN ENTRY.

1.1.1 Types. Each of the approximately 60,000 main entries begins a new line and is printed in boldface type. The entries are mostly single words, abbreviations, or affixes; phrases are entries only if they are foreign and consist of words not otherwise used in the language (à vista). Words are not capitalized unless they are proper nouns. The latter include place names likely to occur in Norwegian writing (including all the townships or herreder), as well as some common given names.

Affixes are either prefixes (ending in a hyphen, e.g. an-) or suffixes (beginning with a hyphen, e.g. -dom). Idiomatic phrases are listed under their main word or words, as described below (1.10). Abbreviations are followed by an equals sign and their spelled-out equivalents (d. e. = det er), occasionally by a comparable English abbreviation (which in this case would be i.e.). Usually, however, they are listed only as idiomatic phrases under their appropriate headword.

1.1.2 Order. The main entries are arranged alphabetically, with the letters æ ø å at the end, in that order. Entries containing hyphens, periods, or slants as part of their spelling follow entries without such marks (e.g. al, -al, a/l, a.l.). Phrases are ordered as if they were printed solid (e.g. al, à la). Capitalized entries follow uncapitalized ones (alf, Alf).

1.1.3 Form. Any word that can have more than one grammatical form is entered in its lexical form: the singular indefinite (sg if) of nouns, the positive singular indefinite masculine (pos sg if m) of adjectives, the masculine singular (m sg) of pronouns, and the infinitive (inf) of verbs. Other forms are entered only if there is no lexical form or if they deviate in some irregular way from the lexical form, in which case there is a cross-reference to the latter (below, 1.5.3).

1.1.4 Headword. Each word is normally entered in all spellings that have been accepted as official since 1917, plus some common dialect forms. Whenever the same word is entered in more than one form, these are cross-referenced to one that is currently official, which is selected as the headword. The translation is always listed under the headword (below, 1.5.2).

1.1.5 Homonyms. Identically spelled entries are distinguished by small raised numbers to the right of the entry (akt<sup>1</sup> akt<sup>2</sup>). Capitalized and punctuated entries are not regarded as homonyms of otherwise identical uncapitalized or unpunctuated entries. Homonyms of different parts of speech are arranged so that nouns come first, then verbs, then the other parts of speech alphabetically.

1.2 LANGUAGE MEMBERSHIP. (See also Section 2, esp. 2.1).

1.2.1 All entries and their grammatical forms have been marked for official language membership. Any item preceded by a plus (+) is usually limited to Bm, while one preceded by a star (*) is usually limited to Nn. Any item preceded by a degree mark (°) is dialectal, i.e. not officially accepted in either Bm or Nn (e.g. °hu she = +hun, *ho). Unmarked items are presumed to be admissible in either language, though they are not necessarily equally common in both. Note that in the glosses dialectal usage is often marked by the abbreviation dial. instead of the degree mark. No systematic distinction of the two languages has been made in the glosses. Marking as + or * does not always imply official status.

1.3 PRONUNCIATION.

1.3.1 Respelled Words. If an entry word is followed immediately by a respelling in square brackets, pronounce it exactly as spelled in the brackets. Give each letter and diacritic mark the usual Norwegian value, as described in the Guide to Pronunciation below. For quick reference see the list of symbols in 3.2 and in the end papers. The diacritics are also listed at the foot of each right-hand page.

1.3.2 Words not Respelled. Most words are not respelled, but are only marked with diacritics which are not part of their spelling. Silent letters are marked by a subscript dot (in the case of d g h t). In order to save respellings, certain conventions have been adopted for letters or combinations of letters that are nearly always pronounced with a different sound than that used in the respelling. These are listed below as "Special Rules for Pronunciation."

1.3.3 Partial Respelling. If only part of an entry is included in the respelling bracket, read the rest of the word according to the Special Rules below. Example: analog [-lá'g], read [analá'g]; agn/skjell [ang'n/], read [ang'n/sjell].

1.3.4 Alternative Pronunciations. If a word has more than one pronunciation, one will be marked on the entry, if possible, while the other will be entered in brackets, preceded by the word "also". The order of the two pronunciations has no significance; both are acceptable. Example: Ag'der [also ag'-], read that Agder can be pronounced either [ag'der] or [ag'der].

1.3.5 No Marking. If a compound is neither marked nor respelled, look for the next preceding word with the same first member and apply the same pronunciation. Example: wiener/vals, read [vi'ner/val's] from the word wiener [vi'ner].

1.3.6 Special Rules for Pronunciation. If a word is not respelled, the following rules will apply: (1) Read all vowels and consonants short unless they are followed immediately by one of the accent marks ( ' ` · ). If there is no accent mark in the syllable, the vowels and consonants will be called "unaccented." Exception: the secondary accent mark (·) has been regularly omitted in the first syllable following a slant line, when the number of consonants clearly indicates the length of the vowel, e.g. hu's/mann, read [hu's/-mann']; hu's/tak, read [hu's/ta'k]; but kris'ten/dom, read [kris'ten/dåmm'] (cf rule for short o below). (2) Read all vowels and consonants with the usual Norwegian values assigned them in the respelling, omitting any that have dots

bs [ps]: absolutt'=[apsolutt']

c [s] before e, i, y, æ, ø:
cøliba't=[søliba't]

[k] before all other letters:
cre'do=[kre'do]

ds [ts]: god's=[got's]

dt [tt]: godt'=[gått']

er [ær] when e is short and accented: ver'den=[væ'r'den]

ky [kjiy]: kyss'=[kjyss']

nk [ngk]: ben'k=[beng'k] (but not in **nkj*, e.g. ten'kje=[ten'kje])

o [å] short accented, or unaccented before two or more consonants:
kom'me=[kåm'me];
fro'kost=[få'kåst'];
morfi'n=[mårfi'n]

qu [kv]: qua'=[kva']

vt [ft]: la'vt=[la'ft]

w [v]: watt'=[vatt']

x [ks]: sex'=[sek's]

below. Exceptions: the following combinations are always pronounced as here shown in brackets, unless there is a respelling to the contrary. The respellings included below are omitted in the dictionary.

1.4 GRAMMAR. (See also 2.13).

1.4.1 Parts of Speech. Each entry is marked for part of speech right after its respelling (if there is one). Nouns are marked by their inflections only (1.4.2), unless they are incapable of appearing with an article, when N is used. Other parts of speech are marked by italicized abbreviations beginning with a capital letter, e.g. A (adjective), Art (article), Av (adverb) etc. For the complete list see the Table of Abbreviations (p. 47).

1.4.2 Inflections. Only such inflections are listed as are necessary for the user to produce the complete paradigm. This requires that he apply the grammatical rules given below for each part of speech (1.4.3-7). As an additional aid, complete sample paradigms are given in 2.13. Whenever possible, only suffixes are listed; irregular forms are listed in full. Different inflections are separated by commas, e.g. stå V stod, stått, read: stå inf., stod past, stått perfect participle. Inflected compounds are marked in the same way, except that a few complicated strong verbs are referred back to their uncompounded forms. Alternate forms for the same inflection are separated by slants, e.g. -en/-et, read: this noun may take either -en or -et in the definite singular. If any alternate differs in language membership from other alternates or from the entry itself, this will be marked, e.g. *-a/+et/*-te*, read: this verb forms its past by adding -et in Bm, -te in Nn, -a in both.

1.4.3 Nouns. These are primarily identified for gender by the suffixed def. sg. article, which most frequently determines the plural form also. If a noun cannot take a definite article, the indefinite is used instead (e.g. en instead of -en, or ei instead of -a etc.). If neither article can be used, it is marked N (e.g. celsius N). Suffixes are to be added directly to the entry form, unless the latter ends in unstressed -e, and one of the suffix alternatives is -a, in which case the suffix replaces the final -e, e.g. vise -a/+-en, read: the def. sg. of vise is visen in Bm, visa in both languages; but hane -n, read: the def. sg. of hane is hanen (in both languages). The final unstressed syllables -el, -en, and -er are repeated with the article in those words where the -e must be dropped when the suffix is added, e.g. alter -eret/-ret, read: the def. sg. of alter is either alteret or altret. Irregular plurals are entered after the abbreviation pl, e.g. bok -a, pl bøker, read: the def. sg. of bok is boka, the indef. pl. bøker.

1.4.4 Adjectives. These are left unmarked for inflection if they add the regular -t of the neuter singular, the -e of the def. sg. and indef. and def. pl. If they do not add -t, the A will be followed by a short dash, e.g. stille A -, read: the neuter sg. of stille is stille. The comparative form (if there is one) is assumed to be *+ere/*-are*, the superlative *+est/*-ast*. Other forms will be listed and appropriately identified.

1.4.5 Adverbs. Inflected adverbs are derived from adjectives, as a rule, and are not separately listed in the Dictionary. Their inflections are limited to comparison and are identical with those of the corresponding adjectives.

1.4.6 Pronouns. The headword for each pronoun is the masculine singular subjective (m sg sb), where these forms are distinguished, so that e.g. det and de must be sought under den, meg under jeg. Since all of these are more or less irregular, nearly all forms are listed and appropriately identified.

1.4.7 Verbs. These are normally identified by the past suffix (pt); if two suffixes are listed, the second is the perfect participle (pp). Other needed forms are labeled, e.g. pr (present), imp (imperative) etc. Note that verbs (contrary to nouns) add all suffixes to the stem, i.e. after subtraction of any unstressed -e or -a, e.g. kaste -a/+et, read: the past of kaste is Bm kastet, both languages kasta.

1.5 CROSS REFERENCES.

1.5.1 Types. All entries which are not themselves headwords (above, 1.1.4) end with a cross reference. There are two different kinds of references, one in the case of deviant spellings (1.5.2), the other in the case of non-lexical forms (1.5.3). Entries are fully marked for language membership, pronunciation, and grammar.

1.5.2 Deviant Spellings. All the spellings of one word are cross-referenced to a single headword entry, where the gloss is to be found. Whenever there is a spelling which is common to the two languages according to the Textbook Norm of 1959, this is used as headword. Only forms listed as obligatory (obligatoriske) or alternative (jamstelte) have been used in this way; optional (tillatte) forms have not been considered. If there is no spelling common to the two languages, but there are two distinct spellings of what is obviously the same word, the Bm spelling has been made headword. Words which may mean the same thing but are not historically related (e.g. anledning and høve) are not cross-referenced. The form of deviant-spelling cross references is to follow the spelling with cf and the headword, e.g. an'de/laus A cf ånde/løs, read: the gloss of andelaus will be found under åndeløs. To save space only one part of compounds is given, with its slash, if the other part is identical with that of the headword, e.g. an'de/drag -et cf ånde/, read: the gloss of andedrag will be found under åndedrag. If there is no slant, a hyphen is used for the same purpose.

1.5.3 Non-lexical Forms. These are listed as entries only if they are in some way irregular, to the extent of having to be listed three or more entries away from the lexical form. To give the user as much help as possible, irregularity has been quite liberally interpreted. Compounds are abbreviated by hyphens (not slants), e.g. an'/gikk pt of -gå, read: angikk is the past of angå, where the gloss will be found. In these cross references the form is identified as an inflection of the headword.

1.5.4 Omitted Spellings. Space has been conserved by omitting deviations which involve regular and predictable relationships between the two languages in their system of suffixes. (1) Infinitives: all infinitives have been listed as ending in -e, as permitted in both languages by the Textbook Norm of 1959. (2) Adjectives: all adjectives that are common to the two languages are listed under their Bm endings -et(e), -ig, and -lig and not under their Nn endings -ut, -ug, and -leg. (3) Mediopassives: all verbs that are common to the two languages are listed under their Bm endings -s and not under their Nn endings -st. Note that the agent suffix -ar of Nn is not suppressed in favor of Bm -er, but is included as a secondary entry, e.g. +ar'v/taker-en, pl-e (= \-ar*), read: the Bm form arvtaker corresponds to Nn arvtakar. The reason is that some words have -er in both languages, e.g. skipper.

1.6 SECONDARY ENTRIES.

1.6.1 Types. After the grammatical information some entries include within parentheses other spellings than the one chosen as headword. These are preceded by an equals sign, are in boldface type, and are marked for language membership, sometimes for grammar. Like the cross references they may be abbreviated with either slants or hyphens. The secondary entries are of two types, being added either to provide additional spellings (1.6.2) or reverse references (1.6.3).

1.6.2 Additional Spellings. If an alternative spelling would appear within three entries of its headword, it is often combined with the latter as a secondary entry, e.g. a'v/kastning -a/+en (= \/kastning*), read: avkastning is usable in both languages, while the form avkastning is limited to Nn.

1.6.3 Reverse References. While all non-headword spellings are cross-referenced to their headword, the reverse is not usually true. But a number of exceptions have been made to this rule, where it might conceivably serve some purpose. An example is the entry au'st/frå Av (= +øst/fra), read: the spelling austfrå is available in both languages and is therefore headword, but the better-known form in Bm is østfra. The latter is also an entry in its proper place, with a cross-reference to austfrå. There are no reverse references to officially unacceptable forms, e.g. from sju to syv.

1.7 USAGE LABELS.

1.7.1 Types. Usage labels appear in italics, usually abbreviated, immediately before the English gloss. When they apply to the entire word, they appear before all glosses; when only to a single gloss, then before that gloss. There are two types, subject labels and status labels.

1.7.2 Subject Labels. These designate the specialized field of activity within which a word or a meaning is normally or basically used. There is a large number of such labels (see Table of Abbreviations, p. 47), e.g., anat. (anatomical), bot. (botanical), jur. (legal), naut. (nautical), etc. The labels pinpoint a meaning, e.g. aksep't-en merc. acceptance, read: aksept is a mercantile word and the gloss "acceptance" is to be taken only in that sense. Some fields (e.g. sports) are written out in full and are not abbreviated. The label hist. (historical) is applied to institutions or customs no longer current, e.g. spåmann in the sense of 'soothsayer'.

1.7.3 Status Labels. These designate the kind of social or literary contexts in which a term is likely to occur. They are limited to the following: archaic, obs. (obsolete), lit. (literary), fam. (familiar), hum. (humorous), pop. (popular), and dial. (dialectal). The following brief statements indicate approximately what is meant by each of these. Archaic (= archaizing): not in current use, but may appear in writings intended to have an old-fashioned flavor, e.g. the historical novels of Sigrid Undset. Obsolete: entirely out of use, found only in older writings. Literary: used in formal or even journalistic writing, but not in speech to any extent. Familiar: favored in informal usage, as among friends or within the family. Humorous: found in jesting contexts, not to be applied seriously. Popular: used chiefly by uneducated people, or humorously by others. Dialectal: geographically or socially limited, usually to rural speakers, and unacceptable in the standard language, except in imaginative literature and for purposes of characterization.

1.7.4 Evaluation. It must not be thought that failure to apply a usage label means that a word could not have been so designated; there are anatomical terms that could have been labeled anat. and dialectal usages not labeled dial. The cue for the labeling often came from Norsk Riksmålsordbok (folk. = pop., fam. = fam.), but it was impossible within the framework of this project to review the entire labeling system of that dictionary. The labels overlap and are to be regarded as suggestive, not exhaustive. Note that American slang usage, when included, has been labeled (pop.), in parentheses, to advise the non-native user of its status.

1.8 ENGLISH GLOSSES.

1.8.1 Problem. The glosses, or translations, constitute the main body of the dictionary and are its chief raison d'être. Because of their complexity, they are also the most difficult to prepare and the least likely to meet with the user's approval. Except in the case of scientific terms with precise, mathematical definitions, it is not possible to speak of exact equivalents between two languages. The vocabulary of any language reflects in its network of meanings the culture and outlook of its users.

1.8.2 Sequence. Instead of just presenting for each word or phrase an unorganized list of possible translations the editors have attempted to organize the glosses into a meaningful sequence. This should simplify the use of the book and at the same time display the ramifications of each term. There are three kinds of glosses, which we will call "simple," "complex," and "multiple."

1.8.3 Simple Glosses. These consist of one, two, or three English words, arranged alphabetically and separated by commas (lodd<sup>1</sup> . . . fate, lot). When there is more than one word, it is intended that they be synonyms of one another, and that their overlap shall show the central meaning of the Norwegian term. Thus "fate" and "lot" overlap and mutually define one another, showing that "lot" is here to be taken in the meaning of "fate," not e.g., of a piece of property.

1.8.4 Complex Glosses. These consist of two or more simple glosses, set off by semicolons (lodd<sup>2</sup> . . . lot (as in cast lots); lottery ticket; lottery prize). The glosses in this example do not overlap in meaning, but they have in common a general association with gambling. The only requirement for a complex gloss is thus that its members have a semantic feature in common.

1.8.5 Multiple Glosses. These consist of two or more glosses, simple or complex, each of which is given a distinct number (1, 2, 3, etc. in boldface type) and set off by periods. Each numbered gloss is sufficiently distinct from the others so that it may to all intents and purposes be thought of as a different word. The multiple glosses of one word have little in common beyond their historical origin. Thus the meanings of lodd<sup>2</sup> referring to gambling have been numbered 1, while those that refer to various kinds of weights are numbered 2.

1.8.6 Order. In arranging the complex and multiple glosses, emphasis has been given to placing the most common or general meanings first, followed by the more specialized or literary meanings.

1.9 SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES.

1.9.1 Cultural Features. Parentheses are used before and after the glosses to introduce additional explanation and comment beyond the bare gloss itself. This includes brief descriptions of Norwegian cultural features, such as foods, folklore, education, history, and geography, especially when these might not easily be available in American works of reference. Others are introduced in order to save the student the labor of looking up obscure technical terms and allusions. English equivalents are regularly given for metric terms. Latin botanical and zoological terms are included for the sake of precision.

1.9.2 Prepositions. An important service to the user who wishes to employ a given Norwegian word correctly or to understand shades of usage is the inclusion of prepositions and other connectives wherever these are called for. Thus "akte . . . 1 heed, pay attention (på to)" is to be read: akte, in the sense of "heed, pay attention," requires the preposition på in those contexts which in English require to. The preposition is usually placed after the last gloss to which it applies; it always appears in parentheses, with the Norwegian word preceding its English gloss. In some cases there may be more than one of either.

1.10 IDIOMATIC PHRASES.

1.10.1 Meaning. Idioms are important lexical items, which must be listed because it is not possible to discover their meanings by combining the meanings of their parts. The expression i dag is an idiom only because its parts i 'in' and dag 'day' do not in English add up to its meaning 'today'.

1.10.2 Form. Idioms are printed in boldface type, but are not listed as main entries. They are preceded by colons, and separated by semicolons. If a word occurs in idioms only, it will be followed immediately by a colon and its idioms and will have no other gloss.

1.10.3 Location. Idioms are listed under their most important member, usually the one of lowest frequency and greatest stress. Thus i dag is listed under dag, while the verb phrase finne på is listed under finne. In some cases idioms are listed under more than one member. Idioms are never interspersed within simple or complex glosses, but are gathered at the end of each multiple (numbered) gloss. Verb phrases (whether with prepositions or reflexive pronouns) are often collected under a separate number. The order of idioms within a gloss is roughly alphabetical.

1.10.4 Abbreviation. Idioms are abbreviated whenever possible. Necessary subjects or objects are represented by Norwegian en, noen, noe and by English sby (for somebody) or sth (for something). When the main entry word, or any of its glosses, occurs in the idiom or its gloss, it is represented by its first letter and a dash (plus possible suffixes), e.g. aktorat . . . prosecution: fra a-ets side on behalf of the p-, read: fra aktoratets side on behalf of the prosecution. Glosses are abbreviated only within one numbered gloss, when there can be no confusion.

1.11 LITERARY ILLUSTRATIONS.

1.11.1 A number of full sentences are listed together with the idioms and in the same format, though they are not precisely idioms, but merely illustrations of literary uses of certain words. These include popular proverbs, which often defy translation, biblical quotations with their exact references, and a number of well-known literary allusions. There are also sentences from Norsk Riksmålsordbok (uncredited) and from writings excerpted for this dictionary (see the Reference Bibliography, p. 43 ff.), usually identified by author only.

2 Historical Background of Norwegian

2.1 What is Norwegian? In our day any dictionary that presents itself as “Norwegian” must begin by answering this question, which is not as easy as one might expect. Within Norway there is sharp disagreement, stemming from a century-old conflict over the problem of providing Norway with a written language which should be at once distinctively and representatively Norwegian. The conflict is not purely linguistic, but runs through the entire fabric of Norwegian social life, and has found frequent and vigorous expression in Norwegian politics. The government officially recognizes the existence of two major types of Norwegian, Bokmål (literally “Book Language”) and Nynorsk (literally “New Norwegian”). The former continues a Danish tradition of writing, which has been greatly modified under the influence of Norwegian speech habits, and is sometimes referred to as Dano-Norwegian. The latter was constructed as a purely Norwegian form of writing about a century ago, based on those modern dialects which most faithfully preserved the forms of Old Norwegian. Either one is admissible in the schools and in government offices, as determined by local and national political authorities. All pupils are required to learn to read both, but individual adults are free to choose their own medium. Bokmål is predominant in urban usage in all parts of the country, while Nynorsk has its strongholds in the rural areas of western and midland Norway. Both languages have a vigorous literary tradition, though Bokmål is overwhelmingly predominant in terms of quantity and variety of writing.

The differences between Bm and Nn (as we here abbreviate them) are not great from an outsider’s point of view. In speech, users of either language communicate easily with those of the other, and the obstacles to reading are not insuperable. In modern times the differences have been decreasing, in part through natural development and in part through deliberate reform by government action. There are many today who envisage as a future goal the fusion of the two languages into one so-called Samnorsk (literally “Common Norwegian”) language. Previous Norwegian-English dictionaries have all been dictionaries of Bm alone. It is no longer fair to the student of Norwegian to exclude the body of Nn literature from his reading, and give the impression that only Bm really exists. At the same time the large area of common ground between the two languages makes it wasteful to prepare two separate dictionaries for them.

The place of Norwegian in a larger scheme of things is given by its close neighborhood to Swedish on the east and Danish on the south. The contact between these three has never been entirely broken, and their mutual relationships through the centuries have been crucial in determining their present-day form. Even today they communicate without interpreters in most situations, each speaker using his own language in a kind of pan-Scandinavian harmony. Together with the more remote and archaic Faroese and Icelandic they constitute the Scandinavian group of languages, which all stem from Old Scandinavian. This was the northern branch of the Germanic family of languages, which includes also modern Dutch, English, and German. These, in turn, are members of the Indo-European stock of languages, extending from Iceland to India, and in modern times throughout the greater part of the world.

2.2 Norwegian and its Neighbors. Norway came into existence as a political entity in the 9th Century A.D., united according to tradition by King Harald the Fairhaired in 872. The only written monuments from this period are inscriptions on rock and other permanent objects in a highly inadequate alphabet known as the Younger Runes. Runes had been in use for magic and monumental writing since at least the 3rd Century, and it is clear from these that the language of Norway in the prehistoric period was a Common Nordic which did not differ essentially from that of Denmark and Sweden.

Christianity was permanently established in Norway soon after 1030 A.D. by the Roman Catholic Church, which brought with it the Latin alphabet and the practice of writing on parchment. The earliest manuscripts in Norwegian are from around 1150. These show a Norwegian language which in some respects was different from contemporary Danish and Swedish. At about the same time as Harald united Norway, a predominantly Norwegian population had established an independent settlement in Iceland, where the Norwegian language flourished in a form that gradually differed more and more from that of the mother country and eventually became modern Icelandic. Exposed as Norway was to constant influence and even domination from her continental neighbors, her language was also more liable to change, especially in grammar and vocabulary. Politically the kingdom of Norway prospered in the 12th and 13th Centuries, and the royal court did much to encourage the writing of Norwegian, primarily through the translation of medieval European writings.

2.3 *The Extinction of Norwegian. Down to about 1300 written Old Norwegian remained substantially similar to Old Icelandic, to the extent that many have used the term "West Scandinavian" to include both, in order to distinguish them from "East Scandinavian," which included Old Danish and Old Swedish. In speech, however, the local communities were beginning to develop differentiated dialects, which formed a gradual transition throughout the North.

As long as there were three kingdoms, there were three courts, where most of the élite were congregated and most of the writing in each country was done. But in the 14th Century a series of dynastic unions between the three royal families resulted in a concentration of power in the hands of a single royal family. From about 1385 there was no longer an independent Norwegian king, and in 1397 the Union of Calmar brought all three countries under the rule of the Danish Queen Margaret. Sweden revolted in 1521 and achieved an independence in 1523 that has never since been lost. Norway did not have the strength to do the same and remained part of a United Kingdom of Denmark and Norway, in which Norway inevitably became the weaker member. This condition lasted until 1814.

During this period the writing of Norwegian gradually disappeared, since Norway had no court or government offices which could maintain the tradition. The writing that was necessary was done in Danish, which was not so different from Norwegian that any great obstacle seemed to stand in the way of its adoption. The process was similar to that which led to the adoption of High German in northern Germany during the same period.

2.4 *The Effects of Independence. Political independence came to Norway in 1814, at a time when Denmark had been defeated by Sweden, and Norway had been promised to Sweden as part of the latter's reward for supporting the Allies against Napoleon. The stimulus of the American and French Revolutions inspired the Norwegians to adopt a democratic constitution and defy the powers in behalf of their own rights as citizens of a sovereign nation. Although the Norwegians were eventually compelled to submit to a dynastic union with Sweden, it was on terms that assured them internal self-government—and a future prospect for complete freedom, which was realized in 1905. The task of the intervening years was one of creating or restoring organs and functions of government atrophied for four centuries. In an age of awakening nationalism and incipient democracy the course was clear: a new nation like Norway had to build her culture on the resources of her own people. Norway had a weak tradition of aristocracy, and pride in the new-won democracy even led to the abolition of nobility in 1821. The traditions of Norway had to be found in the surviving literary sources from the Middle Ages, the Old Norwegian writings, and in the living tradition of oral literature among the common people, who had preserved much of the older culture, untouched by many continental movements. This dual source was tapped for art, music, literature, and language. In language it became the inspiration of vigorous efforts to shape a genuinely Norwegian language. Out of a union of Old Norwegian writing with dialectal Norwegian speech sprang a New Norwegian which became one of the explosive factors in the linguistic life of Norway.

In 1831 Henrik Wergeland (1808—1845), the first great poet-patriot of the new nation, declared in a famous essay that “an independent language of writing” must come into being in Norway “before the century draws to its close.” The Constitution had declared that the official language of the country should be Norwegian, but it had not specified just what this meant. Although all Norwegians wrote Danish at this time, many thought of it as being also Norwegian, thanks to their active partnership during the recent union. But there was also a feeling of Norwegian’s being different from Danish. This feeling built on the striking difference in pronunciation, which raised a gulf even between the most literate Norwegians and their Danish friends. It took a generation of agitation and research before some clarity could be achieved as to just how the two did differ and policies could be formulated on the method for bringing out Norwegian individuality in language.

The most vigorous forces in Norwegian intellectual life during this period were nationalism and democracy. The new-found pride of nationality called for a language distinctive of the nation, so that the blot on the national scutcheon from the days of political subjection might be removed. The surge of democracy under the new revolutionary constitution called for a language that would impose a lesser burden on the children than did Danish and thereby smooth the path of the people to greater educational opportunities. Both movements combined to push the language away from Danish in the direction of the spoken language of Norway. But four centuries had passed since Norway had had a written language of her own, and in the meanwhile the country had developed a great variety of dialectal usage. The rural population had no nation-wide language, only a vast variety of local dialects. The nearest approach to a nation-wide Norwegian was the speech of the bureaucracy and the bourgeoisie, a compromise between Norwegian speech and Danish writing. Norway at this time was a country with an overwhelmingly rural population, ruled by a small upper class which constituted less than ten per cent of the population.

Within the first generation of liberty, two solutions emerged and won adherents, one based on the speech of the upper class and one on that of the common people. The former called for Norwegianization of the Danish writing, the latter for a brand new start.

2.5 The Dano-Norwegian Language.
The earlier and easier of the two solutions to be put into practice was that of a gradual but deliberate changeover from Danish to Norwegian. Writers like Wergeland, especially in his writings for the people, and Asbjørnsen and Moe in their folktales (1841ff.), made a point of employing Norwegian words which were not previously a part of the Danish tradition. These were mostly words characteristic of Norwegian scenery and folk life, used to give local color. At the same time they reflected a conscious effort to break with the Danish vocabulary.

The theoretician and indefatigable agitator for this policy was schoolmaster and grammarian Knud Knudsen (1812—1895), who in the early 1840's began advocating that Danish spelling, grammar, and vocabulary should be gradually Norwegianized. Although some of his reforms went further than this, his point of departure was cultivated speech, which he was the first to identify as a norm. His most famous disciple was the writer Bjørnstjerne Bjørnson (1832—1910), whose poems, plays, and novels became for half a century the most widely read vehicles of the new national ideas and of the reformed Dano-Norwegian language. No other writer of the classic age of modern Norwegian literature went as far in this respect as did Bjørnson. The dramatist Henrik Ibsen (1828—1906) was more cautious in his Norwegianizing, but each in his way contributed to the cutting of Danish linguistic moorings.

The full break did not come, however, until 1907, two years after Norway's political separation from Sweden, when a new orthography was adopted which, in effect, declared Norway's independence from Denmark in linguistic matters. In 1917 a further step was taken, which gave Danish in Norway not only a new look, but also an entirely new feel. While leaving most of the Danish vocabulary undisturbed, these new orthographies had respelled the words in terms of their urban Norwegian pronunciation and given them a different grammar. We are therefore justified in thinking of this language as no longer Danish, but Norwegian, albeit we may call it Dano-Norwegian, to distinguish it from the language we shall describe in the next section. In Norway the name Riksmål, or Official Language, was applied to it by its supporters, beginning in 1899, a name that is still in wide use. But in 1929 the Parliament renamed it Bokmål or Book Language, an inept term which has gradually superseded Riksmål, especially in reference to the government-sponsored form adopted in 1938.

2.6 The New Norwegian Language. While the gradualistic solution was still in its infancy, a more revolutionary approach was launched by Ivar Aasen (1813—1896), a self-taught genius of the people. Only 22 years old he set himself the goal of creating a purely Norwegian language, and with a single-mindedness and purposefulness virtually unparalleled he carried through his plan. His idea was to construct from the materials furnished by the spoken dialects of Norway a new language equal in dignity and range to Danish and Swedish. This would fill the gap left by the extinction of written Norwegian in the Middle Ages, and bring into being a modern Norwegian which would be related to Old Norwegian as modern Danish and Swedish are to Old Danish and Old Swedish.

The old language of Norway had only recently become an object of scholarly study, and Aasen set himself to learning what was known about it. The modern dialects had not been systematically studied at all, and Aasen's first major effort had to be the exploration of their nature. He performed single-handedly the laborious task of traveling about the countryside to collect the vocabulary and grammar of the major Norwegian dialects, using his familiarity with his own dialect of Sunnmøre as a starting point. Aasen had a genius for systems, and the result of his researches was the establishment of an "overall pattern" (to use a term of modern linguistics) for the rural Norwegian dialects, especially those of the areas least "corrupted" by urban or Danish influence. He presented his first research results in a grammar of 1848 and a dictionary of 1850. In 1853 he published a little book containing specimens of the dialects he had investigated, together with some passages written in a generalized dialect which he called "det norske Landsmål," or "the Norwegian national language."

In popular usage the term Landsmål henceforth came to be associated with Aasen's language as its proper name. He himself did not continue to use it, but titled his definitive grammar of 1864 and dictionary of 1873 simply Norsk, or Norwegian. In these works he presented the grammar and the lexicon of his new language. The grammar was a masterpiece of normalization within the framework of his ideology. What he presented was not a dialect, but a completely codified written language. He had fitted the overall pattern of the dialects into a structure of systematic relationships, in which the pronunciation was of less consequence than the inner system of the phonology and the grammar. He did not hesitate to write silent letters to show the etymological identity of different but related word stems. He produced what modern linguists would call a morphophonemic orthography, which displayed at once the unity of the dialects, the continuity with Old Norwegian, and the parity with its nearest neighbors, Danish and Swedish. In his dictionary he displayed a complete stock of words drawn from the dialects, excluding as far as possible Danish and German loan words, and recommending the creation from Norwegian materials of as many terms for the phenomena of modern culture as possible.

If Norway had been an illiterate nation in 1864, without an upper class and a prestige language, there is no reason to believe that Aasen's language would not have been accepted, with some minor modifications. As it was, it broke too sharply with the established habits of the literate portions of the nation. Its norms were based on speech forms that differed widely from those of the urban upper class throughout the country, and even from those of the rural and lower class urban population in southeastern Norway, the most populous and prestigious part of the country. Nevertheless, it filled a need which was recognized by many patriots, and before long there was a small but respectable body of literature, beginning with the verse and prose of Aasen himself. Classic writers of western and midland rural origin like Arne Garborg and A. O. Vinje showed its possibilities as a medium of literary and polemical expression. As modified by these writers, it achieved official recognition in 1885, when the national parliament, the Storting, passed a resolution recognizing it as an alternate medium of public instruction and official usage, alongside the traditional Dano-Norwegian.

By the end of the century Landsmål had begun to spread in the rural schools, vigorous organizations had sprung into being to promote it, and from now on the battle was joined between "Landsmål" and "Riksmål." In 1901 Landsmål achieved a firm orthography along the lines laid down by Aasen, after a period of considerable anarchy and experimentation. In the years that followed, it was modernized step by step and made somewhat more palatable in other parts of the country. In 1929 the parliament rebaptized the language as Nynorsk, or New Norwegian, a name that has gradually replaced Landsmål in the usage of most Norwegians.

2.7 The Twentieth Century. The first generation of Norwegian independence following 1905 proved to be a fertile one for spread and growth of Nn. Following each of the new orthographies of Bm there was a surge of communities which voted the language into their schools. By the outbreak of World War II approximately one-third of the children of Norway were being taught to write Nn, while everyone was required to learn to read it. Students entering the university had to write an essay in Nn as part of their entrance examination. The users of Nn were legally entitled to full equality in relation to users of Bm, e.g., when filling out government forms or writing to government offices; the latter were required to reply in the language in which they were addressed. Government subsidies were made available to authors, theaters, and publications in Nn, on the same basis as to those in Bm.

In spite of such assistance, however, it remained in all practical affairs a secondary language. The school children who were being taught Nn were all rural, and they were concentrated in western Norway and those internal mountain valleys upon whose language Aasen had primarily built his norm. To farsighted men it appeared clear that Nn had no chance of becoming what its advocates wished, the only official language of Norway. At the same time, its position was too firmly entrenched, and its value as a symbol of Norwegian independence too unquestioned for anyone to imagine that it would just shrivel up and die. It had a strength of expression and a poetry of the native sod which gave it a special warmth and musical quality. Its appeal was not unlike that of Robert Burns' Scottish to the people of Scotland. But it was evident that the adaptations to Norwegian habits which had been made by Bm had helped to keep that language dominant. It was still the only one that could be said to flow easily as a medium of public and commercial life. It accounted for the overwhelming majority of the newspapers, magazines, and books that appeared under private auspices, and in its spoken form had a reasonably firm norm, which was regarded by most people as having the greatest social prestige. Instead of becoming a symbol of national unity, Nn had become one of national division, and the controversy between the two kinds of Norwegian threatened to settle down into a cold war between East and West, between City and Country. From an economic point of view it seemed unprofitable to print double sets of school-books and government forms, not to speak of the confusion entailed in requiring pupils to learn two closely similar forms of their own language.

2.8 An Approach to Fusion. The success of the spelling reforms in Bm of 1907 and 1917 gave impetus to an idea that had been proposed more than once, especially from 1900 on. It was eloquently formulated in 1906 by the folklorist Moltke Moe, who had concerned himself greatly with the reform of Bm: "Neither language can choke off the other or cast it out of the country. We cannot slash away either our old history or our later history; we cannot exclude either city or country. Both must participate, each from its own side, in reaching the great goal: a samnorsk ('Common Norwegian') language, grown out of the living dialects in the cities as well as in the country . . . What we need is a mingling of blood, a flowing together." The term "Samnorsk" which was to be used and abused much later, became a slogan for a trend to harmonization and amalgamation of the two language forms. The concept of synthesis was implicit in all the language planning that had been done in Norway so far, and it did not seem impossible that a united Norwegian might be created by purposeful effort. There were supporters of this idea in both language camps, people who were willing to yield a point here and there in their own language in order to bring it closer to the other. Most of its advocates envisaged a gradual fusion brought about by natural development, but there were also some who proposed practical steps toward closer cooperation between the languages.

There were many leading scholars on both sides of the language issue who supported this move, including such distinguished men as the linguist Didrik Arup Seip and the folklorist Knut Liestøl. But the impetus to a vigorous step in this direction had to come from the growing Labor Party, which up to this time had been uncommitted in the struggle. The man who more than any other succeeded in enlisting its support was the historian Halvdan Koht, who combined socialism and nationalism in his personal philosophy. He reinterpreted the language struggle as a class conflict between the rural folk and the urban bourgeoisie, with Nn as the symbol of the former and Bm as the symbol of the latter. The Labor Party, which drew its core support from the urban lower classes, was urged to join the rural folk in their struggle on behalf of the "folk language," which in its essential traits was theirs as well. However, Koht recognized that Nn in its most puristic form was not well adapted to the uses of urban life, and he therefore proposed a rapprochement of the two languages on the basis of the most widespread rather than the most purely Norwegian forms. He was influential in getting this principle incorporated into the so-called "optional forms" of the 1917 reform of Bm. One of the most typical examples of this was the introduction of the feminine singular (and neuter plural) definite article -a in both languages in place of the -i which Aasen had used and the masculine -en which was characteristic of Bm. The form became obligatory in 1917 in the two words kua 'the cow' and barna 'the children,' taking the place of Aasen's kui and borni in Nn and Danish køen and børnene in Bm, which were purely literary forms. This opened the way to its further extension to words where it was much less common in cultivated speech.

2.9 The Orthography of 1938. Socialism was a new factor in Norwegian life of the 20th Century, following the rise of industry and the rapid growth of a politically conscious working class. Tendencies to splintering in the direction of Communism were overcome in the 1920's, and a strong, united Labor Party came into power in 1935, with Halvdan Koht as its Minister of Foreign Affairs. The Labor Party had accepted as its policy the promotion of linguistic fusion along lines suggested by Koht. It was definitely a nationalistic rather than an international party and found in the language a plank which would unite laborer with farmer against the privileged commercial and bureaucratic classes. Labor Party support ensured that the committee for a new reform of the languages which had been appointed by the preceding Venstre, or Liberal, cabinet would survive the change of government and win recognition for its work. Koht was a member of the Committee, which put into practice the principles he had long advocated. The Orthography of 1938 won approval of the Storting thanks to support from Labor, Agrarians, and Liberals, over the opposition of the Conservatives, who by this time were a small and rather insignificant party (31 of 150 members). The major mandate of the Committee had been to prepare a proposal which would "bring the two languages closer together with respect to spelling, word forms, and inflections, on the basis of the Norwegian Folk Language (på norsk folke-måls grunn)." This was more drastic than the preceding reforms in the extent to which it emphasized two principles: (a) its inclusion of "word forms" and "inflections" in the mandate, both of which are clearly structural, and (b) its specification of the basis for the written language as being not the cultivated norm of the educated classes, but the speech of the common people. For both languages it represented a considerable departure from well-established traditions. Folk forms like the feminine gender, the diphthongs au, ei, and øy, and the suffix -a in the past tense of weak verbs, all of which had been optional in Bm, were now made obligatory in a long list of words. The full implementation of this reform and the consequent angry reactions were delayed by the outbreak of war and the German invasion of 1940, which gave Norwegians other things to think about.

2.10 *The Language Commission. Constitutional government was restored at the end of the war, and before long the language controversy was again in full swing. Textbooks which embodied the new "radical" forms of the Orthography of 1938 stirred the animosity of many urban parents, who felt them to be vulgar in tone and inorganic in the Bm language. The opposition, widely publicized in the press, was led by distinguished authors like Arnulf Øverland and Sigurd Hoel, both Labor Party supporters. But most of the solid following came from politically conservative circles, which had the finances to mount a vigorous campaign of resistance to reform. Under the ægis of Riksmålsforbundet (The Riksmål League), various movements were started, including Foreldreaksjonen (The Parents' Action), in opposition to the introduction of folk forms in written Bm. This group regarded itself as a spearhead on behalf of the true Riksmål, which they distinguished from Bokmål, the official term for the same language. They used the term Bokmål as a derisive name, and poured scorn on it as a "Book Language" created and imposed by government bureaucrats. In spite of their opposition the Storting in 1951 passed, by an overwhelming majority (126 against 22 Conservative Party members and two Labor Party mavericks), a resolution to establish a Language Commission. This Commission was to serve the Ministry of Church and Education as an advisory body in matters of language, thus replacing the individual experts and ad hoc committees previously used. One of the directives given it by the Storting was to "promote the approach of the two written languages on the basis of the Norwegian folk language." This reaffirmation of the basic doctrine of the Orthography of 1938 awakened a lengthy and acrimonious controversy.

The Language Commission began its work in 1952. It consisted of 30 members, one half of them representing each language, and a permanent secretariat consisting of one secretary for each language. Among the functions so far performed by the Commission we may note the supervision of the language in textbooks authorized for use in the schools, the collection of research materials on the language problem, cooperation with similar commissions in Sweden and Denmark, advising private persons on language usage, and most importantly, the preparation of a so-called Læreboknorm (Textbook Norm), which was completed and officially adopted in 1959. This norm is held to be only a regulation of the Orthography of 1938, but on some points it rescinds the more far-reaching parts of the latter. It provides a scale of values for the variant forms of that orthography, establishing each one as either obligatory or alternative for the schools, with a further optional class of forms which cannot be used in textbooks, but may be accepted in the pupils' own written work.

2.11 *The Present Situation. In spite of all attempts at fusion, there are still two forms of written Norwegian which are sufficiently distinct in structure and lexicon to be labeled as different languages. The languages are closer together than they ever were, and it may be expected that in the long run Norwegians will find it impossible and unprofitable to maintain both. Bm is still the dominant language of writing, in which at least 85 % of the books published are printed; it is the editorial language of all daily newspapers, though most of these accept contributions in Nn as well. It is the language of virtually all translations of foreign books, and all commercial transactions of any size. It is less predominant in the grade schools, where local option prevails, but even here the postwar years have shown a remarkable reversal of attitude. While Nn grew steadily during the prewar period to a high mark of 34 % of all pupils in 1943—44, it has fallen equally steadily in the postwar years to a new low of 21.5 % in 1962—63. The loss was chiefly in those areas which were newly converted to Nn in the 1930's, especially in northern Norway, but also in rural areas which the new urbanization has turned into suburbs or small towns. Army recruits who were queried in 1950 expressed a nearly 3 to 1 preference for Bm; only 22 % chose the Nn version of a psychological test given them. Only in the four western counties (Møre og Romsdal, Sogn og Fjordane, Hordaland, Rogaland) are a majority of the children learning Nn. At the same time Nn has shown its vigor especially in poetry and on the stage, and a number of young writers and scholars continue to make use of it in their writings. The norms for each language are fairly stable, but one can detect considerable variations from writer to writer, according to the norm which he or his publishers impose on his writing.

2.12 Treatment of the Languages in this Dictionary. In view of the fluid situation which prevails in Norway, it seemed advisable to make a broader selection of words and forms than that normally found in Norwegian-English dictionaries. The solid position of Nn, even though it is a minority one, called for its inclusion. The efforts of the government to encourage a more folk-oriented form of the language can hardly fail to have its effect in the years to come, if only in the shape of a less rigid adherence to the urban norm. Any future changes made by official action are almost certain to be drawn in either language from the other. It is therefore likely that such forms will be found in this dictionary, even if they may be differently evaluated. There is the possibility of further phonetic spellings, but there appears to be less fervor for this kind of reform than there once was. A realization is growing that stability of spelling may be at least as important as its phonetic accuracy.

The markings for language membership (see above, 1.2.1) proved to be more difficult than had been anticipated and occasioned many discussions within the staff. Our general policy was to follow Norsk Riksmålsordbok and include as Bm any word contained in it, or in Sverdrup and Sandvei, Norsk Rettskrivningsordbok. But it was discovered that these books contained a great many local terms, which are marked "dialect" in the former and are not acceptable as part of the standard norm of Bm, although they can and do occur in Bm writers. Many of these have accordingly been marked dial. here to indicate their limitations in this respect. Conversely, our chief sources for Nn, the newly initiated Norsk Ordbok, Hellevik's Nynorsk Ordliste, and Skard's Nynorsk Ordbok proved to contain a number of terms which have previously been forbidden in Nn and are still avoided by the best Nn writers. It has therefore been impossible to lay down hard and fast rules about the usage of many words in the respective languages. For the idioms and glosses the attempt to distinguish the languages was largely abandoned, due chiefly to the scarcity of accurate information about Nn literary usage.

2.13 Comparative Paradigms. In order to show in detail how the grammatical forms of the entries are to be expanded, the possibilities of regular and irregular inflections in both languages are displayed below in the form of paradigms (see above 1.4). The inflections are those of the obligatory, "moderate" norms of the 1959 Textbook Norm, as they are listed in this Dictionary. At the head of each paradigm is the dictionary entry. Forms that are common to the two languages are listed only once.

2.13.1 Nouns. The inflections shown are the singular indefinite (sg if), the singular definite (sg df), the plural indefinite (pl if), and the plural definite (pl df). The English equivalents for the first example are: horse, the horse, horses, and the horses. In Bm a possessive is formed by adding -s to any of the forms listed, e.g. hes'ts, hes'tens, hes'ters, hes'tenes.

Notes. Øye can also have the plural øyer, a dialectal form. Auga can also have the form auge, with the same inflections as ep'le. Some other members of this paradigm are hjarta and øyra. The Nn masculines in pl -er and feminines in pl -ar are small, limited classes, as are the ones with vowel change in the plural in both languages. The larger and more productive classes are the ones called "regular". A small group of distinctively Norwegian neuter nouns are supposed to have the Nn pl df -a in Bm: barn, bein, beist, dyr, garn, hol, kje, kol, krøtter, naut, reis, segl, troll. In Nn barn may have vowel change in the plural: born. "Side forms" not included above are: Nn -i for -a; Nn -or for -er in weak f nouns (type ga'te, da'me above); Bm -er for -e in masculines of the type ba'ker; Bm -a for -ene in masculines of the type hes't. Nn f nouns in -ing have the pl -ar.

2.13.2 Adjectives. The inflections shown are positive (pos), comparative (cp), and superlative (sp), some of which are further marked as indefinite (if) or definite (df), singular (sg) or plural (pl), and masculine (m), feminine (f), or neuter (nt). The English equivalents for the pos, cp, and sp, as applied to the first example, are: pretty, prettier, prettiest. The other inflections have no equivalents in English.

Notes. The df sg of li'ten is also vesle in both languages; li'sle alternates with li'tle in Nn. "Side forms" not listed are: nt -tt for -t after diphthongs in Bm (greitt); nt -ent for -e or -i in Nn (opent); f -i or -a for -en in Nn (naki, naka).

2.13.3 Pronouns. These may have both nominal forms, with subjective (sb), possessive (po), and objective (ob) inflections, and adjectival forms, with masculine (m), feminine (f), neuter (nt), singular (sg), and plural (pl).

(1) Nominal forms.

(a) Personal pronouns. These alone can have all three cases.

Case:	subjective		objective		possessive
Language:	Bm	Nn	Bm	Nn	Bm	Nn
1st p sg	jeg	eg		meg		min
2nd p sg		du		deg		din
2nd p formal		De	Dem	Dykk	Deres	Dykkar

1st p pl		vi		oss	vår
2nd p pl	dere	de	dere	dykk	deres	dykkar
3rd p pl	de	dei	dem	dei	deres	deira
3rd p refl		—		seg	sin

An obsolete Bm form of the 2nd p pl is I (sb), eder (ob), eders (po).

(b) Other pronouns. These have no objective case and a possessive only in Bm.

sb (ob)	+der	ein/+en	+hinannen/*einannan	+hva/*kva	+hvem/*kven
po	—	+ens	+hinannens	—	+hvis
sb (ob)	+hverandre/*kvarandre	+man	same	sjølvsjelv	som
po	+hverandres	—	—	—	—

Notes. A more popular form than +hvis is the phrase +hvem sin (*kven sin); sjølv can form a similar possessive, *sjølv sin. Of the pronouns which may also be used adjectivally and are therefore listed below under (2), the following have possessive forms in Bm when they are used nominally (all formed by adding -s): den, det, denne, disse, hin; alle, begge; annen, andre, hvilken, ingen, mangel, mange, noen; annenhver, enhver.

(2) Adjectival forms.

(a) Possessives

f sg		annethvert	annakvar	ethvert	eikvar	*eikor
nt sg			annakvart		eitkvart	*einkvart

Notes. Another pl of nokon is nokre. In place of hvilken Nn uses kva for ein (+hva for en). In place of *intet/*inkje it is common to use *ikke noe/*ikkje noko and for ingen to use *ikke noen/*ikkje nokon. Side forms not listed: Nn onnor / for anna, nokor / for noka, ingi / for inga.

2.13.4 Verbs. All suffixes are thought of as being added to the stem, which is the infinitive (or name form) minus its final -e, where there is one (the -e of be, le, se is part of the stem). For most verbs the crucial form is the past (pt); only when they are irregular, are the present (pr) and the past participle (pp) listed. The non-paradigmatic inflections are: imperative no ending, e.g. kast (-e after some consonant clusters, e.g. ergre); also -a in Nn verbs of the a-class (kast/kasta); subjunctive -e (kongen leve 'long live the king'); present participle +ende/\-ande*; mediopassive +-es/\-ast*, \-est*. The infinitive (inf) in -e is used for both languages here, although Nn more commonly uses -a. Similarly the mediopassive -es subsumes Nn -ast, unless the verb is peculiar to Nn. For irregular paradigms all the examples are listed. Verbs having a past suffix are called "weak", while those that do not are called "strong."

pp	tal't, tel't tal't	satt' sett'	sol'gt sel't

STRONG VERBS: These are characterized by having no suffix in the past, except for a few verbs which end in +-t (binde, brenne, falle, holde, vinde, vinne, svinne) or -kk (*få, gå, *hange*). They may be classified according to the nature of the vowel change from the stem of the infinitive to that of the past. The change differs for long and short vowels. Within the long vowels it differs according to the vowel of the infinitive. But there are many irregular forms, so that most verbs have to be memorized individually. The following rules apply quite generally: (1) Present is formed in Bm by adding '-er', in Nn by changing the stem vowel as follows:

- a > e
- å > æ
- u > y
- o > ø or e
- (e.g. søve > søv; kome > kjem)

This alternation results from the historical sound change known as umlaut.

(2) Past is formed by changing the stem vowel as follows:

(a) long vowels

 y (jɔ, ju, u) > au/+ø
 e (æ) > a a > o
 å > *e or no change

(b) short vowels

any vowel > a (o)

This alternation results from the historical sound change known as ablaut. The less common alternatives are given in parentheses.

(3) Perfect participle is formed by adding the suffix *+et/*-e/*-i* to the stem, which in most cases has the same stem vowel as the infinitive. Exceptions are found particularly in the long vowel stems with y and in some of the short vowel stems, where the participle has its own vowel, different from either the infinitive or the past. In Bm many participles have adopted the suffix of weak verbs, either -t or -d. Most strong verbs are listed in the dictionary with all their principal parts, e.g., *bi'te V beit/+bet, +bitt/*bite/*-i*. These are some sample paradigms:

3 A Guide to Pronunciation

3.1 Standards of Pronunciation. There is no official or private organization that attempts to dictate standards of pronunciation in Norway. Nevertheless there is considerable agreement, at least for Bm, on what may be called a "standard pronunciation" (SP), which is comparable to the Received Pronunciation of British English or the Bühnenaussprache of German. This does not cover the precise sound quality of each phoneme, but it does regulate with relatively little variation the phonemes used in each word, including the prosodic ones, and their arrangement. SP is a rather literary pronunciation, used in circumstances where some formality is called for, as in reading, lecturing, or serious discussion. It will be used by those persons who have had implanted in them a striving for "correct" pronunciation. Deviations from it may occur in informal or intimate speech, and each region has its own particular variations which are recognized by others as marking one's regional origin. In general, SP tends to remain more closely tied to the spelling than informal pronunciation, and in part reflects such personal achievements as literacy, education, and social status.

In Norway, as in other countries, standards of cultivated pronunciation have been set by the privileged classes and have radiated from urban centers. In the period of the Danish union, when education was centered in Copenhagen, Danish pronunciation represented an ideal for most Norwegians. This tradition persisted into the 19th Century, when the most Danish-sounding kind of Norwegian, that of Kristiansand, had high prestige. The importance of Bergen as an international seaport and a seat of theatrical art also gave its pronunciation a prestige which only faded with the growing predominance of Oslo in the second half of the century. Oslo, as the capital city, is today the center of most cultural activities and its speech therefore a model to many speakers. For this reason it is customary in manuals of pronunciation to take the speech of "educated Oslo speakers" as the norm of correctness, although in actual fact each city has its own educated norm, which often deviates markedly from that of Oslo. Since Oslo is in Eastern Norway, its phonetic base is East Norwegian, though the pronunciation of cultivated speakers is clearly differentiated, not only from that of the surrounding countryside, but also from that of the man in the street.

Nn does not, in the strictest sense, have an SP, since there is no one region, social class, or urban center in which it is the prevailing spoken language. Nearly all who speak it have learned it in school or from reading and follow in their use of it a compromise between the spelling and their own basic dialect. Since its grammar and vocabulary are most congenial to those who have grown up in a Midland or West Norwegian dialect, the most commonly heard pronunciations are also based on these. It is generally felt that the most pleasing Nn pronunciation is from regions like Telemark, which has a Midland dialect with many East Norwegian traits.

The policy followed in marking pronunciations in the present dictionary was to establish at least one pronunciation for each word which would be both comprehensible and socially acceptable. When our sources vigorously disagreed, the situation was saved by adding a second, or rarely a third, pronunciation in brackets, preceded by the word "also." There is no intention of suggesting that the latter is either more or less acceptable than the other. For Bm such written sources as Alnæs, Norsk Uttaleordbok (ed. 1924), Norsk Riksmålsordbok, and Popperwell, Norwegian Pronunciation were considered, but not always followed. The first marking was made by a native of Eastern Norway (Hedmark), Dag Gundersen, and checked by a native of Oslo, Wenche Sandsten. Where these disagreed, a panel of six other East Norwegian speakers was consulted (by having their pronunciations recorded on tape). For Nn the sources were far less adequate, consisting largely of the markings found in Hellevik's Ordliste, which are limited to so-called "foreign" words.

A special problem arose when Bm and Nn words were combined into single entries, since the pronunciations are not necessarily identical even with the same spelling. In a few cases, separate pronunciations are indicated, but for the most part the two have been harmonized. It is assumed e.g. that final g (e.g. in -leg) may be pronounced in Nn, but not in Bm -lig. Combinations of r and following dental consonant form alveolars (supradentals) in East Norwegian speech, but are kept apart in West Norwegian.

The general principle followed has been to provide for American users the simplest possible guide to formal Norwegian pronunciation. It is a familiar fact of language learning that a foreigner is not expected to talk a dialect or an informal variety of a language. If he does, he imperils his status as a foreigner and risks being taken for an uneducated native.

3.2 The Phonemes of Norwegian. SP can be fully described by the assumption of nine vowels, six diphthongs, eighteen consonants, and four prosodies (length, stress, tone, and juncture). This leaves out the factor of (sentence) intonation, which is of less importance in a lexical pronunciation. It also disregards certain marginal phonemes: (1) The vowel [œ], replacing [ø] before [r] in the speech of older persons, e.g. in dør 'door'; (2) the consonant [l], often called "thick l," technically a cacuminal flap, used in Eastern Norway for [l] or [rd] in certain positions in informal speech; (3) the alveolar clusters of [r] plus dental of East Norwegian, discussed below (3.10).

The symbols used in this dictionary to identify each of these phonemes are listed in the table below. For the most part they are letters or combinations of letters taken from the Norwegian alphabet, to each of which has been assigned one of the values which it normally has in Norwegian pronunciation. This will be its most usual value, and whenever it is used in this value, it will be said to be "phonemic." If all or part of a word is placed between brackets, the letters within the brackets are all phonemic. The values here given to them can only be learned by hearing them pronounced. As an aid to the reader who does not have immediate access to a speaker of Norwegian, we have here listed in the second column some symbols of the International Phonetic Alphabet which approach those of Norwegian. In the third column are Norwegian keywords containing the phonemes in question. In the fourth column are English (or other language) words having a rough phonetic resemblance to the Norwegian keywords. The reader is expressly warned that except for the ones marked =, the resemblance is quite inexact and does no more than give a vague idea of the quality. The reader should get a Norwegian to pronounce the keywords and note the marked difference in phonetic quality. Where the fourth column has two words separated by a slant, the Norwegian sound is intermediate between the two.

Only the sounds marked = can be said to have a fairly exact English equivalent. For discussion of phonemes see 3.8 and 3.9. For prosodic diacritics see 3.4–3.7. For rules of respelling entries see 1.3. “Southern” and “Eastern” refer to American dialects.

While vowels and consonants are represented by letters, the prosodies are represented by diacritics: [ː] length, [ˑ] stress (with length), [ˆ] tone (with stress and length), [˗] juncture.

The vowels constitute syllabic nuclei and are either simple or complex. The simple vowels are: [a e i o u y æ ø å]. The complex vowels, or diphthongs, are: [ai au ei oi ui øy].

The consonants constitute syllabic margins. They are: [b d f g h j k kj l m n ng p r s sj t v].

The system for marking pronunciation which is used here is substantially the same as that found in Einar Haugen and Kenneth G. Chapman, Spoken Norwegian, Revised Edition (New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1964).

3.3 Syllabic Structure. Any word is immediately divisible into syllables, each with a nucleus that is usually vocalic, and a potential consonantal margin. Vowels have a quality which we may call "syllabicity," the capacity of acting as syllabic nuclei. Any long vowel or diphthong may constitute a syllable by itself; short vowels require a following consonant unless they are unstressed. Sonorous continuants like [l n r] may also have syllabicity, though only when they are unstressed (aside from interjections). There is a centralized vowel usually written e in the Norwegian alphabet ([ə] in IPA), which may consist of little more than pure syllabicity. In such words as fengsel 'prison', alen 'ell', lærer 'teacher' it is hard to be sure whether there is any vowel at all where the e is written. When preceded by d or t, as in middel 'means' or enten 'either', it is certain that no vowel is actually pronounced, thereby making the consonants syllabic. In our respelling no attempt will be made to reflect this variation from zero to an obscure vowel, most of which is either automatic or free. It will be a rule that an unstressed e which follows the stressed syllable in a word is normally weakened to [ə] and may disappear entirely (as a vowel, but not as syllabicity) when preceded and followed by homorganic consonants.

3.4 Juncture. Within and between words there are often potential breaking points, known as junctures. In English juncture may distinguish a unitary word like nitrate from a compound like night rate because of the juncture in the latter between [t] and [r]. A corresponding Norwegian example is [uˑ'tøɣ] 'vermin' and [uˑt'øɣ] 'remote island', both spelled utøɣ. In the former the [t] is aspirated as are other initial t's, so that it goes with the second part of the compound, while in the latter it is unaspirated like other final or medial t's. The first [u] is slightly longer than the second. The fact that Norwegian spelling mostly does not mark this difference has led to our division of such compounds by a slant whenever the first part is stressed. It is possible for a word to lose its juncture; this appears to be the case in such words as altså, smørbrød.

3.5 Length and Gemination. As the table in 3.2 shows, each vowel comes in two varieties, one unmarked and usually called "short," another marked by a raised dot [ˑ] and usually called "long." In Bm the diphthongs function as long vowels, while in Nn they may also have short counterparts, e.g. in words like greitt nt or nøydd pp. If we regard the short vowels as basic, the long can be said to consist of the corresponding short vowels plus a factor of length, or quantity. Length not only gives the vowel greater duration (as much as double), but also makes it tenser, less central, and mildly diphthongal. Short vowels are crisper and shorter than English vowels, while the long are steadier and less diphthongal than the English.

In Norwegian, vowel length is linked to the gemination (doubling) of consonants, which may also be regarded as a kind of length. The effect is somewhat different, however, for geminated consonants are not appreciably different from the simple in quality, only in quantity. In weakly stressed position and before other consonants even the length is often hard to detect, e.g. in the second part of hus/katt 'house cat' or all/visst 'most certainly.' The one constant feature is that before long consonants the vowel must be short; long vowels and long consonants cannot coexist in the same syllable.

Since the spelling is not consistent about writing geminated consonants, a raised dot has occasionally been resorted to in our respelling to mark the presence of length. The dot is used only when there is neither stress (primary) nor tone (Accent 2) in the syllable and the spelling fails to make it clear which sound is long. It is used when a single consonant is to be pronounced long, as in ei'en/dom 'property', or when a consonant cluster does not cause shortening of the vowel, as in små/pe'nt 'pretty' nt, or when the length is on a later syllable than the first, as in gra'ds/forskjell 'difference of degree.'

While length has here been marked only on the second members of compounds with stress on the first, it can occur elsewhere also, in syllables two or more syllables removed from the stress: u'bestem'melig 'indeterminate', sub'jektiv 'subjective'.

3.6 Stress (with Length). Stress in Norwegian is phonetically similar to that of English and performs much the same function. It gives prominence to at least one syllable in each independent utterance, e.g. a single word pronounced in isolation. Other syllables in the same word are then weaker and may be said to be unstressed. Since we are dealing here only with individual words, there is no need to consider the stresses of connected discourse. We shall therefore assume only one kind of stress, that which for English is called loud, or primary. Weak stress will here be considered as absence of stress. The important thing about stress is its placement: e.g. positiv 'positive' is pronounced [po'siti'v], while positiv 'grind-organ' is pronounced [po'siti'v]. As these examples show, the symbol for stress is ['], an acute accent.

It is a rule of Norwegian that every stressed syllable must contain either a long vowel or a long consonant, in other words, one and only one long element. For this reason it is possible to use the stress mark to represent length also, by placing it either after the vowel (when it is long) or after the consonant (when it should be geminated). In the preceding examples, the location of the acute accents shows that the vowels are long. Such a word will not ordinarily be respelled in brackets, since its pattern is sufficiently indicated by writing the acute accent on the regular spelling: po'sitiv vs. positi'v. The same is true of gemination when it appears in the spelling, e.g. kat'ten 'the cat', prosess' 'process'. As these examples show, the mark is placed between geminated consonants medially, but after them finally. Often, however, there are words whose spelling is ambiguous or misleading, e.g. tam' [tamm'] 'tame', fi'nt 'fine' nt vs. sin't [sinn't] 'angry'. For consistency's sake, every entry has been marked for stress and length in this way, either on the spelling or a respelling.

In rapid speech the geminated consonant tends to be somewhat shortened, but is still distinctly different from the simple, e.g. before other consonants, as in visst 'certainly', or in trisyllables where the spelling has only one consonant, as in an'anas 'pineapple', min'imum 'minimum', neg'ativ 'negative'. The placing of the mark here shows that the consonants are long. In a few interior dialects (Gudbrandsdalen) there are stressed syllables with short vowels followed by short consonants (as in English), e.g. in the place name

Vågå. Speakers from other parts of the country are here likely to say either [vâ'gå] or [våg'gå].

3.7 Tone (with Stress and Length). Each stressed syllable is accompanied by some kind of pitch movement, usually one which deviates either up or down from the median or normal pitch of the utterance. In North, West, and South Norway the usual pitch of a stressed syllable is high, as in English; the pitch in the rest of the utterance rises to this high and then falls away from it to a low conclusion. Any variation in emphasis or in emotional attitude can change this basic melody in a number of ways which we cannot discuss here. In East Norway and Trøndelag the usual pitch of a stressed syllable is low, so that the unemotional intonation pattern is the opposite of the English: the pitch falls to the stress, and then rises to a high at the end. This is often misunderstood by foreigners as a question intonation, which it is not. In lexical pronunciation, as when reading a list of words, Norwegians from East Norway are most likely to end each word on a high pitch, rising from a low point in the stressed syllable. In a whole sentence pronounced with only one major stress, the pitch rise may span as much as an octave.

In most Norwegian speech there is an additional phenomenon of pitch which is peculiar to Norwegian and its immediate neighbors, Swedish and (some dialects of) Danish. This is the use of lexical pitch to distinguish otherwise identical words (reminiscent of a phenomenon well known from Chinese and many African languages; in Europe it is found e.g. in Lithuanian and Serbo-Croatian). In Norwegian it occurs only in connection with stressed syllables and only in words which have at least one syllable following the stress. We shall call this phenomenon "tone" and say that tone is a feature that may be added to words of this type. Words that do not have tone, as here defined, are usually said to have Accent 1, or monosyllabic tone. Since the stress of Accent 1 words may be accompanied by a variety of pitches, as we have seen, one cannot for Norwegian as a whole speak of any particular pitch as characteristic of Accent 1. This so-called accent is simply stress with whatever tonal pattern is normal for the dialect in question. The high or low pitch deviation coincides with the stress and is limited to it. No stress can occur without it.

Accent 2, or polysyllabic tone, is different. As noted, it requires at least two syllables, of which the first is stressed, to develop. The pitch pattern is more complex than that of Accent 1 and its most characteristic phase comes later, usually developing on the second syllable. In North, West, and South Norway it rises to a peak, like that of Accent 1, but the peak comes later in the word, so that it is still rising when the other is falling, and only falls later. In East Norway and Trøndelag it does not immediately fall, but rises to a peak and then falls, with the fall coming in part on the second syllable. In all parts of the country except North Norway there is often a second rise and fall which may sound like a new stress.

It is possible to speak Norwegian without tone (as is done e.g. for Swedish in Finland), since most of the pairs of words that are distinguished by tone are not likely to be confused in context. But natural and correct Norwegian speech requires that it be applied. We have therefore marked tone for all words by the use of the grave accent [˘]. Like the acute accent, this implies both stress and length, as previously noted.

In summarizing the preceding three sections, we note that the symbols [˘ ˙ ˘˘] are all used to mark length of vowels and, on occasion, gemination of consonants. [˘˘] is pure length ("secondary stress"), [˘] length plus stress ("primary stress, accent 1"), ['] length plus stress plus tone ("primary stress, accent 2").

3.8 The Vowels. The nine simple vowels are distinguished from each other by features of tongue height, advancement, and lip rounding. In some dialects of the Midland and West Norway an older Norwegian system is preserved, which is similar to that of Danish (or German). This is often used by speakers of Nn, but sounds odd or foreign when used in Bm. The pattern formed by its features is as follows (rounding is shown by circles, the others are unround or spread):

	┌───────────┐
High	i      (y)	(u)
Higher mid	e      (ø)	(o)
Lower mid	æ	(å)
Low	a

In comparison with this system, the typical East Norwegian (Oslo) system is markedly skewed (in the same direction as Swedish): [e æ] are lowered, [a] is retracted, [å] and [o] are raised, [u] is advanced, [y ø] are partially unrounded. In addition, [o u] are "overrounded," i. e. pronounced with a narrow, puckered rounding which is quite different from the rather relaxed rounding of [y ø å]. The whole system has undergone a counterclockwise movement, leaving only [i] constant. It may be represented as follows (overrounding is shown by a double circle):

High	i      (y)      (u)	(o)
Mid	e      (ø)	(å)
Low	æ	a

For English speakers the rounded vowels are particularly difficult, since they coincide neither with any English sound, nor precisely with those of German or French. [å] seems intermediate between aw and oh, [o] between oh and oo, while [u] is sometimes misheard as yew. [u] is reminiscent of French u or German ü, but so is [y]; the former is more oo-like, the latter more ee-like than these, since [u] is overrounded and [y] is underrounded in comparison with them.

In general the short and long vowels fit into the same pattern, even though the short vowels are slightly more centralized than the long. When the long vowels are emphasized, they are lengthened and slightly diphthongized: the high vowels are narrowed near the end so that [i y] almost end in a [j], [u o] in a [w]; the mid vowels are lowered so that [e] sounds like [æ], [ø] like [øö], and [å] like [åå]. Exaggerated diphthongization of the long vowels is considered dialectal or slovenly.

3.9 The Diphthongs. Each of the six diphthongs consists of two short vowels which function as a single syllabic nucleus. The second member is always a high vowel, [i y u]. This is shown in the respellings used to represent the diphthongs in this dictionary: [ai au ei oi ui øy]. As far as the first member is concerned, these respellings are not always accurate, since they are identical with the regular spelling. The first members of [au] and [ei] are usually [æ], while that of [oi] is [å], so that these would be more accurately written [æu æi åi]. They are here treated as unit symbols. As compared with similar English diphthongs, they have a shorter first member and a more sharply articulated vocalic second member. The crisper pronunciation of the Norwegian diphthongs is clearly heard by comparing English neigh to Norwegian nei. There is a common Oslo pronunciation of [au] as [æv], which should be avoided. According to their origin and function the diphthongs can be divided into a central group [au ei øy] and a marginal group [ai oi ui]. The former are important because many words alternate between a traditional Bm form without diphthong and a Nn (or recently introduced Bm) form with, e.g. ben vs. bein 'bone', død vs. daud 'dead', mø vs. møy 'maiden'. The marginal diphthongs are mostly found in words of foreign origin or in exclamations, e.g. kai 'quay', koie 'hut', hui 'whee'.

3.10 The Consonants. The consonants are distinguished from each other by the features of oral closure, nasality, voice, and four points of articulation (labial, dental, alveolar, palato-velar), plus some special features for [l r h]. Except for the alveolars, the consonant system differs little from one part of the country to the other. The pattern formed by the features is as follows:

Manner of articulation		Points of articulation
		Labial	Dental	Alveolar	Palato-velar
Stops	Voiced	b	d	rd	g
	Voiceless	p	t	rt	k
Nasals	Voiced	m	n	rn	ng
Spirants	Voiced	v			j
	Voiceless	f	s	rs/sj	kj
Laterals	Voiced		l	rl
Trill	Voiced			r
Breathed	Voiceless				h

Most of these have reasonably close counterparts in English; special discussion will be given only to those that differ markedly from the nearest English equivalents.

Points of articulation. The labials correspond closely to English bilabial [p b m] and labiodental [v f]. The dentals are articulated farther forward than English apicals, at the lower edge of the gums. The acoustic difference is most noticeable with [l], which is "lighter" than in English. In East Norwegian the [l] is somewhat darker after [a & o] than the other vowels, but in West Norwegian it is light everywhere. The alveolars are retroflex, r-like consonants, discussed below under "r-clusters." The palato-velars include palatal spirants, velar and pre-velar stops (depending on the following vowel), and the glottal [h]. Northern dialects (including trøndsk) have a palatalized series corresponding to the dentals (except for [s]).

Manner of articulation. The stops are articulated as in English, the voiced being lax and unaspirated (with initial and final tendency to slight devoicing), the voiceless tense and aspirated, except after [s] and postvocally. Along the coastal strip of southern Norway the voiced stops are extensively devoiced, as in Danish. The nasals are like their English counterparts; but they are not followed by [g] in East Norwegian, as they are in English words like finger, linger. Only in some West Norwegian dialects will one hear the [g] sounded. Although [ng] is a unit phoneme, it functions like a geminated consonant and is preceded by short vowels. The spirants [v f] are like English [v f], and [j] is like English consonantal [y] except for being slightly more tense and fricative. Its voiceless counterpart [kj] is strange to English, but familiar to anyone who knows German ch in ich. It is like a very strong [h], esp. in words like hue, human, but with a narrower and definitely palatal opening. In some dialects it is an affricate not unlike English ch, but this pronunciation is not to be recommended. The sibilants [s sj] are close to English s and sh. Norwegian conspicuously lacks z and zh (as in rose and erosion), so that one must guard against pronouncing these in Norwegian words. The lateral differs from that of English in being pronounced with a flat tongue, which helps to produce the "light" effect mentioned above. The trill [r] of most Norwegians is produced by vibrating the tip of the tongue against the gums. In Oslo it rarely gets more than a single tap, except when it is geminated. In Bergen and in the coastal cities from Stavanger to Risør, as well as the shoreline that joins the latter, the [r] is uvular, i.e. pronounced in the throat, with or without active participation of the uvula. This is similar to the standard [r] of Danish, German, and French. Concerning the [r]-clusters see below. The breathed consonant [h] is like English h.

The r-clusters. In East Norwegian (as in much Swedish) the tap of the [r] is lost before dentals, while these are changed into alveolars, producing a new series of retroflex consonants. In phonetic transcriptions these usually appear with dots under them. In our respelling we have left them as they are in the orthography, since the assimilation is in most cases predictable. They sound like the corresponding English consonants, with an r-coloring somewhat weaker than that of American [r] in the same position. The exception is [rs], which in many people's speech has coincided with [sj]; for this reason the word *æs*j 'ish' is sometimes misspelled ærs. The same speakers who assimilate these clusters usually give this sound also to s before

l, e.g. in slå [sjlå']; while this is considered acceptable in initial position, it is held to be vulgar after vowels, e.g. in Oslo [os'lo, not osj'lo]. Coalescence of [r] and [d] fails to take place in Bm in some literary words, e.g. ferd [fær'd] 'journey', verden [vær'den] 'the world', verdig [vær'di] 'worthy'; but it does occur in ferdig [fær'di] 'ready', verdi [værdi] 'value', far din [fa'r-din] 'your father'. As the last example shows, the assimilation also takes place across word boundaries. It is not heard in the speech of West and South Norwegians, whether they use tongue-tip or uvular [r].

Silent consonants. A great deal of respelling has been avoided by placing dots under certain consonants (esp. đ ǵ ʰ) that are spelled but not pronounced. For words that are common to both languages the Bm rules have been followed; Nn pronounces some that are silent in the former, though many speakers follow the same rules. Length is not affected by silencing: sølv = [søll'], lann = [lann'], jórd = [jó'r].

Special Rules. It is important to keep in mind that certain letters and letter sequences are not respelled even though they are unphonemic by the preceding rules. This is done only when they invariably (or nearly so) are pronounced in a certain way, so that it would be wasteful of space to keep respelling them. Thus g, k, and sk are nearly always "soft" (palatalized) before i, j, and y, i. e. they are pronounced [j kj sj] respectively. For this reason they are here respelled only when they do not have these pronunciations. Similarly the vowels e and ø are pronounced [æ å] respectively in certain positions, unless the respelling shows the contrary. The complete list was given above in 1.3.6 and should be memorized by the user.
